'60s Pill linked to breast cancer

United Press International

STOCKHOLM, Sweden — Women who began taking birth control pills when they first became available in the 1960s stand a greater chance of developing breast cancer, says a study released in Sweden.

The study, published in the Swedish Medical Association journal Lakartidningen, showed the risk of breast cancer is higher among young women who took the first generation pill, which was prepared with high dosages of the hormone estrogen.

Since the 1960s, new birth control pills were introduced that contained much lower hormone doses. Most researchers agree there is no evidence, so far, of increased risk of breast cancer from these pills.

Widespread use of low hormone-based pills began in the 1970s and it will be several years before its effects can be adequately studied, the doctors who conducted the study said, but they called for a reconsideration of early, long term use of birth control pills as a method of contraception.
